Because I was at the SITE conference without a feasible way to work on my page this past week, I'm doing a lot of catch-up this weekend. I've looked at future assignments, and note that the week of our module presentations is also the week I will have a presentation for the Advanced Stats class. Life is certainly not dull!

This assignment to critique our peer's module has been a big help - especially since John's is much farther along than mine is. Michelle's comments on my sparse module were likewise a big help. I never mind thoughtful, constructive criticism. Now to get busy and incorporate what I have learned in order to finish the module!

The instructions for editing the text menu in #3 on p. 248 of the book are a little misleading - does one select the entire table IN THE MENU CELL, or the entire table? If the entire table is selected, doesn't that make the entire page editable?

The challenge for me, as I think about how I am learning the material in the class, is to practice a particular task enough times so that I "know" how to do the task. For instance, although I completed the activities in the book as they were assigned, I find myself having to go back and repeat the task before using it on my module. Creating a template is one of those tasks. I think because the synchronization in Dreamweaver was not working smoothly (it was changing the case of filenames) and I have refrained from using the feature, an otherwise smooth learning process has been interrupted. I'm putting up a second page tonight, but need to revamp my template to reflect the feedback I have received.

My fourth reflection should be full of concrete examples of my reactions to the creating of a web page.
